Mr. Bryan has been criticised in some quarters on the ground that he waited until assured of the democratic nomination for the Presidency before advocating government ownership of railroads thus committing his party to a policy to which many of its members object. To this criticism he has made a conclusive reply, showing that two years ago he was an avowed advocate of the policy in question. And last year, in a carefully prepared speech delivered before the Iroquois Club in Chicago, he spoke strongly in favor of Government ownership, using substantially the same arguments as he did in his recent New York speech. That Chicago speech was not only published in substance in the newspapers throughout this country, but also in Mr. Bryan's own paper, the Commonwealth, and from time to time in the same journal the policy has been advocated.

There is, therefore, no good reason for the complaint that he had concealed or withheld his views in this regard.
